Taking a calibrated approach to easing curbs for phase 3

Focus turns to reviving economy but with eye on balancing act to manage transmission risks

While the authorities in most parts of the world have worked tirelessly to bring the coronavirus under control, Singapore appears to have taken a different approach. Instead of immediately lifting restrictions, the government has opted for a gradual and measured approach, allowing businesses to reopen and residents to travel more freely.

The move is seen as a balancing act, as the country seeks to revive its economy while keeping the virus under control. Singapore has managed to keep the number of new cases relatively low, thanks to strict measures such as contact tracing and social distancing. However, as businesses and schools reopen, there is a risk of a rebound in infections.
